Abstract: To maximize fitness we need to evaluate everything we encounter: is it important? Should I pay attention? How good or bad is it? Those evaluations are dynamic and need to adapt to changes in the environment or our internal state. I will describe fMRI studies in which we examined the neural encoding of these value-related functions and behavioral studies in which we identified individual differences in these processes that are associated with pathological behavior, including overeating and psychiatric symptoms.